- Dehumanization: The legacy of slavery left Black women in a position of vulnerability. They were subjected to brutal treatment, sexual exploitation, and systemic oppression, which laid the groundwork for their marginalization in society.
- Motherhood: Contrary to the prevailing narrative that glorified white motherhood, Black women were often denied the opportunity to nurture their children. Their maternal roles were exploited, and they were frequently separated from their offspring, further complicating their identities.

The Rise of Feminism

The feminist movement, which gained momentum in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, initially focused primarily on the concerns of white women. This narrow focus often excluded the voices and experiences of women of color, particularly Black women.

- Exclusion from Mainstream Feminism: Black women were frequently sidelined in discussions about women's rights. Their unique challenges, such as the dual burden of racism and sexism, were often overlooked.
