Origins of Ashes and Snow

Gregory Colbert began conceptualizing "Ashes and Snow" in the late 1990s, driven by a desire to create a visual narrative that transcends traditional boundaries. His journey took him to various remote locations around the globe, including India, Sri Lanka, and Africa, where he immersed himself in the natural environment and the lives of animals. The project was born out of a deep respect for the interconnectedness of all living beings.

Colbert's approach to photography was radically different from conventional methods. Instead of capturing fleeting moments, he sought to create an immersive experience that would allow viewers to feel a profound connection with the subjects in his work. This led him to explore the relationship between humans and animals, emphasizing empathy and understanding.

Creative Process

Colbert's creative process involves several distinct stages:

1. Research and Exploration: Colbert traveled extensively, studying the behaviors of animals in their natural habitats and forming relationships with local communities. This groundwork was crucial for understanding the subjects he would later depict.
2. Photography: Unlike traditional wildlife photography, Colbert often worked closely with animals, creating a bond that allowed for intimate moments to be captured on film. His use of black-and-white and sepia tones gives the images a timeless quality.
3. Film and Installation: "Ashes and Snow" is not limited to still photography; it also includes film installations that enhance the storytelling aspect of the project. These films feature slow-motion sequences of animals and humans interacting in serene environments, evoking a sense of peace and introspection.

4. Exhibition Design: The exhibition itself is a work of art, featuring large-scale photographs displayed in a specially designed space. The materials used for the exhibition, including handmade paper and natural elements, reflect Colbert's commitment to sustainability and environmental consciousness.
