Early Years with the Celtics

Brad Stevens took over as head coach of the Boston Celtics in 2013, coming from a successful tenure at Butler University. His coaching prowess quickly gained him respect, but it was his transition to a front-office role in 2021 that allowed him to shape the roster more directly.

The Transition to Front Office

When Stevens was promoted to President of Basketball Operations, he inherited a team with high expectations but also some challenges. The Celtics had a talented core, but they were struggling to consistently compete at the highest level. Understanding the need for roster improvement, Stevens began to assess the team's strengths and weaknesses, setting the stage for an active trade strategy.
