Understanding Aggression in the Pre-War Era

Aggression in the period leading up to World War II refers to the deliberate acts of violence or warlike behavior initiated by certain countries to expand their territories or influence. This era saw the rise of fascist regimes that pursued aggressive foreign policies, challenging the fragile peace established after World War I. Germany, under Adolf Hitler, aggressively violated the Treaty of Versailles by rebuilding its military and pursuing territorial expansion. Italy, led by Benito Mussolini, invaded Ethiopia in 1935, demonstrating blatant disregard for international law. Japan's expansionist ambitions manifested in its invasion of Manchuria in 1931 and later other parts of China. These acts of aggression destabilized global diplomacy and increased tensions among world powers.

Key Aggressive Actions

The aggressive moves of the Axis powers were instrumental in shaping the global political landscape:

- Germany's reoccupation of the Rhineland in 1936.
- Italy's invasion of Ethiopia in 1935.
- Japan's invasion of Manchuria in 1931 and later expansion into China.

- Germany's annexation of Austria (Anschluss) in 1938.
- The Sudetenland crisis and the German demand for Czechoslovakian territories.

Each of these actions represented a clear challenge to international peace agreements and norms, contributing to mounting global instability.

The Policy and Impact of Appeasement

Appeasement was a diplomatic strategy employed primarily by Britain and France in the 1930s aimed at avoiding war by conceding to some of the demands of aggressive nations. The policy was rooted in the desire to maintain peace and avoid the devastation experienced during World War I. However, appeasement ultimately failed to prevent conflict and arguably emboldened aggressive powers to pursue further territorial expansion. The most notable example of appeasement was the Munich Agreement of 1938, which allowed Germany to annex the Sudetenland region of Czechoslovakia without military opposition.

Reasons Behind Appeasement

Several factors influenced the adoption of appeasement:

- The trauma and losses of World War I made many leaders reluctant to engage in another conflict.
- Economic difficulties, including the Great Depression, limited the willingness to invest in military buildup.
- Underestimation of Hitler's ambitions and the belief that his demands were reasonable or limited.
- Political divisions and pacifist sentiments within Britain and France.

Despite these reasons, appeasement failed to check aggression and delayed necessary military preparations.

Consequences of Appeasement

The policy of appeasement had significant repercussions:

- It undermined the credibility of Britain and France as defenders of smaller nations.
- Encouraged Germany and Italy to pursue further aggressive policies.
- Weakened alliances with countries like Czechoslovakia, Poland, and the Soviet Union.
- Ultimately made the outbreak of World War II more likely as aggressive states felt empowered.

Major Events Leading to War

The period covered by chapter 31 section 1 includes several critical events that directly led to the outbreak of World War II. Alongside aggression and appeasement, these events illustrate the failure of diplomacy and international cooperation during the 1930s. The invasion of Poland by Germany in September 1939 is considered the immediate trigger for war, following a buildup of conflicts and diplomatic crises throughout the decade.

Significant Pre-War Events

Key moments that escalated tensions include:

1. Japan's Invasion of Manchuria (1931): Marked the start of militaristic expansion in Asia.
2. Italy's Conquest of Ethiopia (1935): Demonstrated the weakness of the League of Nations.
3. German Rearmament and Rhineland Remilitarization (1935-1936): Violated Treaty of Versailles and Locarno Treaties.
4. Anschluss with Austria (1938): Germany annexed Austria without resistance.
5. Munich Agreement and Sudetenland Annexation (1938): Britain and France conceded to German demands.
6. Occupation of Czechoslovakia (1939): Germany broke the Munich Agreement by seizing the remainder of Czechoslovakia.
7. Nazi-Soviet Non-Aggression Pact (August 1939): Paved the way for the invasion of Poland without fear of Soviet intervention.
8. Invasion of Poland (September 1, 1939): Triggered Britain and France to declare war on Germany.
