Common Clothing Signs in American Sign Language

Familiarity with basic clothing signs is fundamental for effective communication in sign language. American Sign Language includes specific gestures to represent everyday apparel such as shirts, pants, shoes, and hats. These signs typically utilize natural handshapes and movements that visually mimic the item or its usage. Learning these core signs helps build a strong foundation for discussing clothing.

Basic Apparel Signs

The most frequently used clothing signs in ASL include:

- Shirt: The dominant hand, flat with fingers together, taps the chest area twice, symbolizing a shirt's front.
- Pants: Both hands form fists and move downwards along the legs, indicating trousers.
- Shoes: The dominant hand mimics tying a shoe by making a looping motion near the foot area.
- Hat: A flat hand taps the top of the head, representing a hat worn on the head.
- Dress: Both hands sweep downward from the shoulders, showing the flow of a dress.

Accessorizing Clothing Signs

Aside from clothing, accessories also have distinct signs. For example:

- Glasses: Fingers of both hands are positioned near the eyes, outlining the shape of glasses.
- Jacket: Both hands mimic putting on a jacket by moving from the shoulders outward.
- Scarf: One hand wraps around the neck in a circular motion, indicating a scarf.

Variations and Regional Differences in Clothing Signs

Sign languages, including ASL, vary across regions and communities, leading to multiple versions of clothing signs. These variations can be influenced by local culture, dialects, and the evolution of the sign language itself. Understanding these differences is important for interpreters and learners to avoid miscommunication.

Regional Sign Differences

For example, the sign for "coat" may differ between Northeastern and Western United States Deaf communities. Some may sign it by mimicking putting on the coat, while others use a different handshape or movement. Similarly, "boots" might be signed with an exaggerated foot movement in one region, but with a more subtle gesture in another.

Adaptations in Other Sign Languages

While this article focuses on ASL, it is important to note that other sign languages, such as British Sign Language (BSL) or Auslan, have their own unique signs for clothing. Learners working in multilingual or international contexts should be aware of these differences to ensure clear communication.

Non-Manual Signals and Context in Clothing Signs

Non-manual signals (NMS) such as facial expressions, head movements, and body posture play a crucial role in conveying meaning when signing about clothing. These cues provide additional context that clarifies or modifies the message.

Facial Expressions and Emphasis

When discussing clothing in sign language, facial expressions can indicate emotions or opinions related to the apparel. For instance, a raised eyebrow may signal a question about clothing choice, while a smile could express approval.

Contextual Usage

Context is particularly important when describing clothing in sign language to avoid ambiguity. The signer may need to specify details such as color, style, or condition of the clothing through additional signs or descriptive gestures. This enhances clarity and ensures the message is fully understood.
