Convicts of the First Fleet were an important part of Australian history. In 1788, the First Fleet arrived in Australia, bringing with it a group of convicts who were sent to the newly established penal colony. This event marked the beginning of European settlement in Australia and had a profound impact on the country and its Indigenous people. In this article, we will explore who these convicts were, why they were sent to Australia, their journey, life in the penal colony, and their legacy.

Who Were the Convicts?

The convicts of the First Fleet were men and women who had been found guilty of crimes in England and sentenced to transportation. Many of them were not hardened criminals but rather individuals who had committed minor offenses. Here are some key points about the convicts:

- Diverse Backgrounds: The convicts came from various backgrounds, including the poor, the unemployed, and even some who were educated.
- Crimes Committed: Common crimes included theft, pickpocketing, and forgery. Some were convicted for more serious offenses, but many were charged with crimes of necessity, such as stealing food.
- Age and Gender: The convicts included individuals as young as 12 and as old as 60. Surprisingly, about 20% of the convicts were women, which was unusual for penal transportation.

Why Were They Sent to Australia?

In the late 18th century, England faced several social issues, including overcrowded prisons and rising crime rates. To address these problems, the British government decided to establish a penal colony in Australia. Here are some reasons for this decision:

Overcrowded Prisons

- Prison Conditions: English prisons were overcrowded and unhealthy, leading to poor living conditions.
- Need for Alternatives: Transportation to Australia was seen as a solution to relieve overcrowding and provide a new start for convicts.

Colonization of Australia

- New Land: The British government wanted to establish a presence in Australia, which was seen as a vast and unclaimed land.
- Economic Opportunities: A penal colony could provide labor for developing agriculture and infrastructure in the new territory.
