The 1960s: The Inception of a Legacy

- Floyd Little: One of the first standout players for the Broncos was Floyd Little, who played from 1967 to 1975. Little was a three-time Pro Bowler and is often credited with helping to put the Broncos on the map. His combination of speed and power made him a dual threat, and he became the first player in franchise history to have his number retired.
- A New Offensive Strategy: During this time, the Broncos relied heavily on the running game, primarily due to the limitations of their passing attack. The success of Little set the stage for future running backs in the organization.

Key Players of the Era

- The 1980s Era of Dominance: The Broncos made their first Super Bowl appearance in 1977, setting the stage for a more competitive team in the following decade. The running backs during this time were pivotal in sustaining drives and helping the team reach three Super Bowls in the 1980s.

- Impact on the Franchise: The Broncos' offensive scheme under head coach Mike Shanahan allowed Davis to thrive, demonstrating the effectiveness of a power-running game complemented by play-action passes.

As the new millennium dawned, the Broncos faced challenges in maintaining their dominance. The running back position saw a mix of talent and inconsistency during this time.

Key Players and Shifts in Strategy

- Clinton Portis: Acquired in a trade from the Washington Redskins, Portis quickly became a fan favorite in Denver. His ability to make defenders miss and his speed made him a dynamic player. He rushed for over 1,500 yards in 2003 before being traded after just two seasons.

Knowshon Moreno and the Power of a Dual Threat

- Super Bowl Appearance: Moreno played a pivotal role in the Broncos' Super Bowl XLVIII run, showcasing his versatility as both a runner and a receiver.
